9:05	12:00	Doing Research Ethically - Using Your Health Data, Including Diverse Perspectives and the Future of Patient-Oriented Research Have you ever wondered how your health data is used in research? Is that research being done ethically? Who is involved in health research and why does diversity matter? In the age of Fitbits, electronic medical records, and big data, it's natural to wonder whose health data is being accessed, how our health data is being used, if it is being used to improve health care, and whether our privacy is being kept. How do we ensure research is conducted ethically and what are some key considerations? We don't have all the answers, but in this session we will explore these issues, getting clarity on what protections are in place, areas that are being improved on, and where things are going. All of the speakers will be approaching these topics from a patient-oriented research perspective. Our speakers include Michel White, entrepreneur, patient partner and advocate; Kim McGrail, faculty with the UBC Centre for Health Services and Policy Research and Scientific Director of Population Data BC; Brittney LaPietra, BC SUPPORT Unit Fraser Centre Research Navigator with a background in law and ethics; and other special guests with expertise in patient-oriented research and diversity.
